Deep down in the disused shafts

Journalist Mark Olade is a young American journalist who cut his teeth on The Star as an intern from the Medill School of Journalism at Chicago's Northwestern University. This year, he returned to South Africa, sponsored by the Fund for Investigative Journalism and hosted by Wits University's Centre for Sustainability in Mining and Industry, to investigate the phenomenon of illegal miners or zama zamas for The Star. This is what he found.

The ZAMAS, known as the 'disused towns' around the mines, are taking on a new lease of life as the industry contracts. The small towns that were once bustling with activity are now dotted with abandoned buildings, abandoned vehicles, and abandoned dreams. The空气中弥漫着一种不祥的气氛，电线杆上挂着被风刮得歪歪扭扭的巨幅海报。

The ZAMAS, known as the 'disused towns' around the mines, are taking on a new lease of life as the industry contracts. The small towns that were once bustling with activity are now dotted with abandoned buildings, abandoned vehicles, and abandoned dreams. The空气中弥漫着一种不祥的气氛，电线杆上挂着被风刮得歪歪扭扭的巨幅海报。